Political Renewal: Occupations, Springs, and Tea Parties

Daniel J. Myers

Professor of Sociology
Vice President and Associate Provost
University of Notre Dame

It was not long ago that I criticized social movement study for inventing novelty where it did not really exist. I wrote, “scholars have been waiting for, wanting, perhaps even panting after the next big change in how social movements operate...that something fundamental could be changing in how activists, protest, and, therefore, standard politics operate is an exciting prospect—and that we might be living through it, poised to record, study, and interpret it in contemporaneous relief, even more so.” Despite that desire, however, I concluded five years ago that things really hadn’t changed much—at least in terms of the implications for theory. But now, I think the time has finally come. Three recent mobilizations have provided us with something new to sink our collective teeth into. The Tea Party, the Arab Spring, and Occupy Wall Street represent changes in the motivations and tactics driving social and political change that can renew the study of protest and collective political influence. These three bursts of political behavior reveal important edges of social movement study and, at the same time, exhibit roots in the now classic ideas in the field.

Daniel J. Myers is Professor of Sociology, Vice President, and Associate Provost at the University of Notre Dame. His current research examines racial rioting in the 1960s and 1970s, deterministic and stochastic models of diffusion for collective violence, mathematical models of collective action, media coverage of protests, demonstrations, and riots, and game theoretic analyses of small group negotiation. He has published many books and articles primarily focused on social movements, the diffusion of social phenomena, social psychology, and urban politics. These include: Toward a More Perfect Union: The Governance of Metropolitan America (with Ralph Conant), Social Psychology (with John DeLamater), and Identity Work in Social Movements (with Jo Regger and Rachel Einwohner).

Myers has been particularly active in the social movements and collective behavior scholarly area, serving as the editor of Mobilization and founding the Center for the Study of Social Movements at Notre Dame which organizes the annual John D. McCarthy Lifetime Achievement Award and Distinguished Lecture, and the annual Young Scholars in Social Movements Conference.

Daniel has served as the Director of Faculty Development and Research in the Kroc Institute for International Peace Studies and then Associate Dean in the College of Arts and Letters, where he guided a rapid expansion of the social science division, the creation of the Center for Social Research, and strategic advances in the college’s research programs. A popular and innovative teacher who has been particularly active in leading undergraduate research, Myers has won the Rev. Charles E. Sheedy, C.S.C., Award for Excellence in Teaching—the College of Arts and Letters’ highest teaching honor.
